LESLIE WAYNE Wayne manipulates the medium of painting by approaching oil paint as a sculptural material. She often wraps, folds, cuts and builds up her surfaces, creating works that take on three-dimensional textures. The tactile quality of her work evokes the experience of peeling and unrolling phenomena. Her relationship to language is rooted in memory, especially in the light, colors and geography of the West. Based in midtown Manhattan, Wayne approaches her subjects as an opportunity to depict visual manifestations of physical forces: compression, subduction and submergence. There are not pictures of nature in the traditional sense, but lyrical contemplations of movement and stability.
